Periaqueductal gray blocks the expression of kindled seizures in a rat amygdala-kindled model. To determine the role of the periaqueductal gray (PAG) in kindled amygdala seizures (AS), we examined the effects of bilateral PAG electrical stimulation on electrical afterdischarges (ADs) in amygdala-kindled rats. In the first experiment, PAG was stimulated (1 mA, 50 microseconds, 2 Hz) at various afterdischarge onset latencies or at times after ADs, and ADs were induced again. The latency of ADs was determined 30 min after PAG stimulation at the AD onset latency, and the ADs were induced again 30 min later. By this procedure, we determined that PAG stimulation 30 min after AD onset decreased AD duration. Then, PAG was stimulated at 30 min after ADs. PAG stimulation 30 min after AD onset blocked ADs induced by a 25-s stimulation train. In the second experiment, ADs were evoked in the amygdala by 100-Hz electrical stimulation of the amygdala, then PAG was stimulated at 30 min after ADs. The PAG stimulation induced a reproducible suppression of the amygdala AD. In the third experiment, PAG was stimulated 50 min after the amygdala AD was induced. After 50 min, the AD latency was determined and then PAG was stimulated. PAG stimulation induced AS during ADs. By our
