The present invention relates to pharmaceutical compositions which can be used for the treatment of pathologic conditions associated with unwanted cell growth and proliferation, and methods of using such compositions. In particular, pharmaceutical compositions and methods are provided for the treatment of pathologic conditions associated with unwanted cell growth and proliferation which occur during the cellular differentiation process. Cellular differentiation is the process by which cells progress from an undifferentiated state to a more mature state, with a change in the properties and functions of these cells. The differentiation process leads to the development of fully mature cells having new functions that are of benefit to the organism. The precise process of cellular differentiation is not yet completely understood. The commonly held view is that a combination of stimuli, including growth factors or matrix proteins, first stimulate a cell to proliferate. When the cell number reaches a certain critical mass (a  $2 \times 10^9$  population), the proliferation stimulus is removed, and the cells then begin to differentiate. The cell will usually stop dividing when the terminal differentiation or maturation process is initiated. The terminal differentiation may involve the increase of cell size or enlargement, the synthesis of large amounts of a single protein or the induction of a specific protein, or a change in enzymatic activity. The end result is
